

Chapter V - Thuvia - Maid of Mars

Chapter V begins with Carthoris fighting for survival as he races through a black tunnel, chased by snarling banths whose roars echo through the passage. The oppressive darkness is pierced only by his determination and the cold gleam of his blade. Each step forward is a victory against the fear pressing in around him. Emerging into a luminous valley under the light of Mars's moons, he's struck by the surreal beauty of the hidden world before him—lush landscapes, red-furred lions, and copper-skinned people unlike any he's met on Barsoom. This sudden shift from terror to awe unsettles him, but there's no time to rest. The creatures here may be unfamiliar, but the danger is no less real. Carthoris moves cautiously, his thoughts drifting toward Thuvia, whose absence sharpens his focus more than any weapon ever could.

His hopes are realized when he stumbles upon Thuvia, her figure framed against the otherworldly glow of the valley. The joy is short-lived, however, as they are soon caught in the chaos of a fierce clash. Green warriors, savage and relentless, descend upon the city. Carthoris leaps into the fight, blade flashing with inherited precision. The defenders, though appearing primitive, show remarkable coordination, aided by their animal companions—mighty lions that leap into battle with silent understanding. Thuvia, though not wielding a weapon, stands tall. Her very presence inspires resistance, and her quiet strength holds Carthoris steady. With each parried blow and calculated strike, Carthoris proves that his loyalty is more than words—it is forged in action.

The tension deepens as the battle stretches on, and Carthoris's gaze often returns to Thuvia, measuring every risk through the lens of her safety. His heart beats not just for survival but for her, though she remains distant, unsure of what to believe. Her recent abduction has left her cautious, even of him. Despite the urgency of the battle, an unspoken dialogue lingers between them—questions, doubts, and unacknowledged hope. Carthoris knows that her heart may still belong to another, yet he cannot stop himself from fighting as if it were his own to protect. Even when Hortan Gur, the ruthless leader of the green warriors, presses the attack, Carthoris does not flinch. His mind is a storm of emotion, but his sword never falters.

As arrows fly and steel clashes, the tide begins to turn. The city's bowmen, though armed with simple weapons, fight with disciplined fury, their unity overcoming the green men's brute force. With them, the great lions move in near silence, their golden eyes locked onto enemies with predatory focus. Carthoris, caught between the chaos of war and the stillness of his feelings, presses forward with unmatched resolve. His presence becomes a rallying point. Thuvia watches, torn between admiration and apprehension. In this storm of motion and meaning, their connection deepens, shaped not by words but by shared danger and trust earned through risk.

The battle finally breaks as the green warriors retreat, their numbers thinned and morale shattered. Carthoris, though exhausted, does not celebrate. His eyes are only on Thuvia, who still seems uncertain of where he stands. She thanks him with grace, but her expression is guarded. He senses her doubts—wounds not yet healed, suspicions still alive. Yet her closeness, her willingness to stand beside him in this foreign place, tells him she hasn't turned away. The war around them is easing, but another continues quietly between heart and reason. They are surrounded by mystery—who are these people, and what lies behind their command of lions and strength of will?

Carthoris senses that the city holds more than just warriors and beasts. There's an ancient knowledge pulsing beneath its soil, and it has chosen to reveal itself to him and Thuvia at a critical moment. His curiosity is matched by concern. Will this place become refuge or trap? And more urgently, can it offer them the space to understand each other before war, duty, and deception pull them apart again? The victory feels momentary, a pause in something larger. Carthoris remains ready—ready to fight again, not just for peace, but for a truth he can't yet speak: that every step he takes is for her.

This chapter threads themes of identity, devotion, and cultural mystery into one tapestry of action and emotion. Carthoris's battle is not only against foes but against the uncertainty that clouds Thuvia's trust. And Thuvia, surrounded by strength and danger alike, must decide whom to believe in a world where loyalty is tested constantly. Their bond, while not yet secure, is building its foundation in shared trials. In the heart of an unknown land, under twin moons and uncertain fates, something genuine is taking root—born not of promise, but of proof.

