The exchange grows increasingly personal, with Kennedy accusing Hurley of misogyny and Hurley questioning her judgment. Lewis interjects, urging a focus on facts rather than emotions, but the tension remains unresolved.

The chapter concludes with Stansfield finally intervening, demanding clarity on Rapp's background. Hurley admits he lacks concrete evidence but insists Rapp's abilities are too advanced for his claimed experience. Kennedy stands firm, attributing Hurley's skepticism to resentment over her role in recruiting Rapp. The unresolved conflict leaves Rapp's future in the program uncertain, setting the stage for further scrutiny and potential revelations about his true capabilities and origins.

Chapter 21

In Chapter 21 of American Assassin, key CIA operatives—Kennedy, Stansfield, Hurley, and Lewis—gather at a secluded Virginia safehouse to discuss the progress and concerns surrounding a new recruit, Mitch Rapp. The meeting takes place in a soundproof basement room equipped with surveillance technology, emphasizing the secrecy of their work. Stansfield, the Deputy Director of Operations, sets the tone with his quiet authority, while Hurley and Lewis clash over Rapp's potential. Rapp's physical prowess, demonstrated by his recent victories over seasoned operatives, becomes a focal point of debate.

The tension escalates as Hurley expresses skepticism about Rapp's background, citing his rapid mastery of Brazilian jujitsu and lack of military experience. Lewis, however, advocates for trust-building in training, contrasting Hurley's preference for aggressive deception tactics. Kennedy defends Rapp as her recruit, highlighting Hurley's resistance to her involvement. The disagreement reveals deeper conflicts about recruitment methods and the balance between trust and operational secrecy within the agency.

Hurley's investigation into Rapp's past adds fuel to the fire. He reveals that Rapp's claimed inexperience contradicts his exceptional combat skills, raising suspicions about his true identity. Kennedy dismisses Hurley's concerns as biased, accusing him of undermining her authority. Stansfield remains neutral but presses for clarity, underscoring the need for thorough vetting. The chapter underscores the high-stakes nature of their work and the personal rivalries that complicate decision-making.

The chapter concludes with unresolved tension, as Hurley's distrust of Rapp clashes with Kennedy's confidence in him. Lewis attempts to mediate, but the operatives' conflicting philosophies—Hurley's pragmatism versus Lewis's emphasis on trust—highlight the challenges of shaping effective operatives. The debate leaves Rapp's future uncertain, setting the stage for further scrutiny and potential conflict within the team. The chapter effectively captures the intensity and complexity of intelligence work, where personal biases and professional judgments collide.

Chapter 22

In Chapter 22 of American Assassin, key intelligence figures—Kennedy, Stansfield, Hurley, and Lewis—gather at a secluded Virginia lake house to discuss a new recruit, Mitch Rapp. The meeting takes place in a soundproof basement room equipped with surveillance technology, emphasizing the secrecy of their operations. Stansfield, the Deputy Director of Operations, sets the tone with his quiet authority, ensuring the discussion remains confidential. The tension is palpable as the group prepares to address Rapp's unexpected prowess during training, which has already resulted in injuries to two seasoned operatives.

The focus shifts to Rapp's capabilities, with Hurley expressing frustration over Rapp's rapid mastery of combat skills, including Brazilian jujitsu. Lewis, the therapist-like figure, attempts to mediate while highlighting concerns about Hurley's aggressive training methods. Hurley defends his approach, arguing that deception is inherent to their work, while Lewis counters that trust is foundational. Kennedy, Rapp's recruiter, clashes with Hurley, who dismisses Rapp's lack of military experience and questions his background. The debate reveals deeper friction between Hurley's traditionalist views and Kennedy's modern, urban-focused approach to counterterrorism.

Hurley reveals he investigated Rapp's past, uncovering discrepancies in his story. Rapp allegedly claimed minimal martial arts experience but quickly dominated his dojo, raising suspicions about his true identity. Kennedy accuses Hurley of undermining her recruitment efforts, while Hurley insists Rapp's rapid skill acquisition is implausible. Stansfield, growing impatient, demands clarity, but Hurley can only voice vague doubts. Kennedy dismisses Hurley's concerns as bias, attributing them to his resistance to her involvement in the program.

The chapter ends with unresolved tension, as Hurley's distrust of Rapp clashes with Kennedy's confidence in her recruit. Stansfield's silence suggests he is weighing both sides, while Lewis attempts to steer the conversation toward operational integrity. The debate underscores the challenges of balancing trust and deception in intelligence work, as well as the generational and methodological divides within the team. Rapp's enigmatic background remains a point of contention, setting the stage for further conflict and revelation.

Stansfield, the Deputy Director of Operations, sets the tone with his quiet authority, while Hurley reveals his frustration over Rapp's rapid ascent, including injuring a seasoned instructor and besting Hurley himself in combat. The tension among the group is palpable as they debate Rapp's potential.

The chapter highlights a clash of perspectives on training and recruitment. Lewis advocates for trust-building and ethical methods, while Hurley defends his aggressive, deceptive tactics to quickly identify top candidates. Kennedy, who recruited Rapp, challenges Hurley's traditional approach, arguing that urban counterterrorism requires different skills than conventional military training. Hurley, however, dismisses Rapp's lack of formal Spec Ops background, insisting his rapid mastery of combat skills is suspicious. The debate escalates into personal jabs, revealing underlying tensions about authority and methodology within the team.

Hurley's investigation into Rapp's background adds fuel to the fire. He reveals that Rapp's claimed inexperience in martial arts contradicts his rapid dominance at a local dojo, where he defeated nearly all opponents within months. Lewis notes Rapp's Brazilian jujitsu style, further raising questions about his true origins. Stansfield, growing impatient, demands clarity, while Kennedy accuses Hurley of bias, suggesting his distrust stems from her role in Rapp's recruitment. The chapter underscores the uncertainty surrounding Rapp's past and whether he poses a risk or represents a rare talent.

The chapter concludes with unresolved tension, as Hurley insists Rapp's abilities are too advanced to be genuine, while Kennedy defends him as a prodigy. Stansfield's silence hints at his weighing of the evidence, leaving the reader to anticipate the next steps in Rapp's evaluation. The ideological divide between Hurley's skepticism and Kennedy's advocacy reflects broader conflicts within the CIA about innovation versus tradition in intelligence work. The stage is set for further scrutiny of Rapp's loyalties and capabilities.

Chapter 25

The chapter opens with a clandestine meeting at a lakeside house in Virginia, attended by Kennedy, Deputy Director Stansfield, and Hurley. Stansfield's bodyguards remain outside, emphasizing the secrecy of the discussion. The group moves to a soundproof basement room equipped with surveillance technology, where Stansfield takes charge, signaling the gravity of the conversation. Lewis, the therapist, advocates for trust-building in training, while Hurley defends his aggressive methods, arguing that deception is inherent to their work. The tension highlights a clash between Hurley's pragmatic approach and Lewis's emphasis on psychological integrity.

Kennedy and Hurley's conflict escalates as she mocks his traditional recruitment criteria, suggesting urban counterterrorism requires different skills than wilderness survival. Hurley retaliates by revealing his investigation into Rapp's background, claiming Rapp's rapid mastery of Brazilian jujitsu is suspicious. Kennedy accuses Hurley of undermining her authority, as she has spent years vetting Rapp without leaving traces. The exchange reveals deeper tensions about trust, methodology, and gender dynamics within the team.

Stansfield, growing impatient, demands clarity about Rapp's background. Hurley insists Rapp's abilities are too advanced for his claimed experience, hinting at potential deception. Kennedy dismisses Hurley's concerns as bias against her recruitment. The chapter ends unresolved, with Stansfield poised to intervene, leaving the reader questioning Rapp's true allegiances and the team's ability to reconcile their differences. The confrontation sets the stage for further scrutiny of Rapp's past and the team's operational philosophies.

Chapter 26

In Chapter 26 of American Assassin, key CIA operatives—Kennedy, Stansfield, Hurley, and Lewis—gather at a secluded lakeside house in Virginia for a confidential meeting. The discussion takes place in a soundproof basement room equipped with surveillance technology, emphasizing the secrecy of their mission. Stansfield, the Deputy Director of Operations, leads the meeting, setting a tense and formal tone. The group's dynamic is immediately apparent, with Hurley's impulsive interruptions contrasting with Stansfield's calm authority and Lewis's analytical approach.

The chapter focuses on the debate over Mitch Rapp, a recruit brought in by Kennedy. Hurley expresses skepticism about Rapp's abilities, citing his lack of military experience and questioning his rapid mastery of combat skills. He reveals that Rapp defeated a seasoned instructor, Victor, and even bested Hurley himself in a confrontation. Lewis, however, defends Rapp's potential, while Kennedy dismisses Hurley's concerns as biased, accusing him of undermining her recruitment efforts due to personal grudges.

Hurley's investigation into Rapp's background adds fuel to the conflict. He discloses that Rapp's claimed inexperience in martial arts contradicts his swift dominance in a local dojo, suggesting Rapp may be hiding his true capabilities. Kennedy defends her recruit, arguing Hurley's methods are invasive and counterproductive. The tension escalates as Hurley insists Rapp is a security risk, while Kennedy attributes his distrust to misogyny and professional rivalry.

The chapter concludes with unresolved tension, as Stansfield grows impatient with the infighting. The debate highlights broader themes of trust, deception, and the ethics of training operatives. Hurley's aggressive skepticism clashes with Kennedy's strategic patience, leaving Rapp's future with the agency uncertain. The meeting underscores the high-stakes nature of their work and the personal conflicts that complicate their mission.

Chapter 32

The chapter opens with a clandestine meeting at a lakeside house in Virginia, attended by key intelligence figures: Kennedy, Deputy Director Stansfield, and Hurley.

Stansfield's bodyguards remain outside, emphasizing the secrecy of the discussion.

The group moves to a soundproof basement room equipped with surveillance technology, where Stansfield takes charge, signaling the gravity of the conversation.

The setting underscores the high-stakes nature of their work and the need for absolute discretion.

The focus shifts to Mitch Rapp, a recruit who has demonstrated exceptional combat skills, including besting Hurley and severely injuring another instructor, Victor. Hurley expresses skepticism about Rapp's background, arguing that his rapid mastery of combat techniques is suspicious. Kennedy defends Rapp, highlighting his potential, while Lewis, a therapist, stresses the importance of trust in their operations. Tensions rise as Hurley's aggressive training methods clash with Lewis's emphasis on psychological integrity.

Hurley reveals he investigated Rapp's past, discovering the recruit had quickly dominated a Brazilian jujitsu dojo despite claiming limited experience. This fuels his suspicion that Rapp may be a plant or hiding his true identity. Kennedy accuses Hurley of undermining her recruitment efforts due to bias, while Stansfield remains neutral, seeking concrete evidence. The debate escalates into a broader conflict over recruitment philosophies, with Hurley advocating for ruthless efficiency and Kennedy prioritizing unconventional talent.

The chapter concludes with unresolved tension, as Hurley's distrust of Rapp contrasts with Kennedy's confidence in him. Stansfield's patience wears thin, demanding clearer justification for Hurley's claims. The clash reflects deeper divisions within the team—between traditionalist and progressive approaches to espionage. The chapter sets the stage for further scrutiny of Rapp's background and the potential consequences of their ideological rift.

Chapter 33

The chapter opens with a tense scene where Rapp, an operative, threatens a banker named Dorfman by holding a knife to his dog's eye to coerce him into opening a safe. Dorfman, emotionally distraught, relents and reveals the combination, prioritizing his dog's safety over his own life. Rapp and his partner Hurley discover Nazi memorabilia in the safe, confirming Dorfman's ties to extremist groups. After retrieving critical files and hard drives, Hurley executes Dorfman, coldly justifying it as part of their mission. The scene underscores the brutal efficiency of their work and the moral ambiguity of their methods.

The narrative then shifts to Moscow, where Ivanov, a high-ranking SVR officer, reflects on a lucrative gas deal he secured through a mix of negotiation and intimidation. He likens his tactics to those in The Godfather, embracing corruption as a means to power in post-Soviet Russia. Ivanov criticizes the inefficiencies of the old communist system, contrasting it with the current cutthroat capitalism where only the ruthless thrive. He takes pride in his ability to bypass bureaucratic hurdles for foreign investors, demanding a 10% stake in all deals as his non-negotiable fee.

Ivanov's worldview is further explored as he justifies his actions as necessary for protecting Russia's resources from exploitation by outsiders. He sees himself as a gatekeeper, more deserving of wealth than young, inexperienced businessmen. The chapter highlights the parallels between organized crime and state power in Russia, with Ivanov positioning himself as a key player in this chaotic landscape. His arrogance is palpable as he dismisses competitors and revels in his influence, though his hangover from a night of celebrating hints at his vulnerabilities.

The chapter concludes with Ivanov's assistant, Shvets, entering the office and subtly probing his boss's condition. Ivanov, irritable and in pain, demands water and aspirin, resisting the urge to drink vodka to numb his headache. Shvets mentions finalizing the gas deal contracts and inquires about an upcoming mission to Beirut, hinting at the next phase of their operations. The interaction underscores the hierarchical and manipulative dynamics within Ivanov's world, where loyalty and opportunism coexist. The chapter sets the stage for further intrigue, blending espionage with criminal enterprise.

Chapter 34

In Chapter 34, CIA operative Mitch Rapp and his colleague Hurley confront a banker named Dorfman, who has been aiding terrorists. To extract information, Rapp threatens Dorfman's poodle with a knife, exploiting the banker's emotional attachment to the animal. Dorfman, unable to bear the thought of his dog being harmed, relents and opens his safe, revealing Nazi memorabilia and financial documents linked to terrorist activities. Hurley executes Dorfman for his collaboration with terrorists, and the duo retrieves critical evidence before fleeing to Zurich for their next mission.

The chapter then shifts to Moscow, where SVR officer Ivanov reflects on his lucrative but corrupt dealings in post-Soviet Russia. Having secured a profitable gas contract, Ivanov compares the current economic landscape to The Godfather, emphasizing the pervasive corruption and power struggles. He justifies his actions as necessary in a system where inefficiency and bribery dominate, positioning himself as a gatekeeper for foreign investors seeking to navigate Russia's treacherous business environment.

Ivanov's worldview highlights the parallels between the old Soviet bureaucracy and the new capitalist free-for-all, where only the connected and ruthless thrive. He takes pride in his ability to deliver results, demanding a 10% stake in all deals as his non-negotiable fee. His arrogance is tempered by a hangover, and he relies on his subordinate, Shvets, to manage his discomfort while discussing upcoming plans, including a trip to Beirut.

The chapter contrasts Rapp's brutal efficiency with Ivanov's calculated corruption, illustrating the moral ambiguities in both counterterrorism and post-Soviet geopolitics. While Rapp uses extreme measures to dismantle terrorist networks, Ivanov exploits systemic chaos for personal gain, embodying the cynicism of Russia's elite. Both storylines underscore the theme of power wielded without scruples, whether in the name of justice or profit.

Chapter 35

In Chapter 35 of American Assassin, Rapp and Hurley confront Dorfman, a banker suspected of aiding terrorists, in a tense interrogation. Rapp threatens Dorfman's poodle with a knife to coerce him into opening a safe, revealing his greater attachment to the dog than his wife. The safe contains incriminating evidence, including Nazi memorabilia and financial records linking Dorfman to terrorist activities. Despite Dorfman's pleas that he was merely doing his job, Hurley executes him, emphasizing the gravity of his crimes. The duo then prepares to leave for Zurich, hinting at further missions tied to financial networks supporting terrorism.

The chapter shifts to Moscow, introducing Ivanov, a corrupt SVR officer who leverages his position for personal gain. Fresh from closing a lucrative gas deal, Ivanov reflects on the parallels between post-Soviet Russia and The Godfather, where power and corruption dominate. He criticizes the inefficiencies of the Soviet system, contrasting it with the current chaotic yet profitable environment, where bribes and threats are tools of the trade. Ivanov prides himself on delivering results for foreign investors, demanding a 10% stake in their ventures as payment for his "services."

Ivanov justifies his actions as a necessary evil in safeguarding Russia's resources from exploitation, though his motives are clearly self-serving. He views himself as superior to both the incompetent Soviet bureaucrats and the young businessmen flooding the market. His assistant, Shvets, attends to his needs, but Ivanov's hangover and irritability reveal his stress and paranoia about maintaining control. The chapter underscores the moral decay in both the financial and political spheres, with Ivanov embodying the ruthless opportunism of post-Soviet elites.

The narrative highlights the interconnected themes of power, corruption, and violence. Rapp and Hurley's brutal methods contrast with Ivanov's calculated greed, yet both scenarios expose the dark underbelly of global systems—terrorism financing and exploitative capitalism. The chapter sets the stage for further conflict, with Rapp heading to Zurich and Ivanov planning his next move, suggesting a collision of these worlds. The tone remains gritty and suspenseful, maintaining the novel's tension and moral ambiguity.

Chapter 36

In Chapter 36 of American Assassin, Mitch Rapp and his associate Hurley confront a banker named Dorfman, who has been aiding terrorists. To extract information, Rapp threatens Dorfman's poodle with a knife, a tactic that proves effective as Dorfman relents and opens his safe. The safe contains incriminating evidence, including Nazi memorabilia, which confirms Dorfman's morally bankrupt alliances. Despite Dorfman's pleas that he is merely a businessman, Hurley executes him, emphasizing the gravity of his crimes. The chapter highlights Rapp's moral conflict and the brutal efficiency of his methods, as well as Hurley's ruthless pragmatism.

The narrative then shifts to Moscow, where SVR officer Ivanov reflects on a lucrative deal he secured the previous night. Ivanov draws parallels between the corrupt systems of post-Soviet Russia and The Godfather, reveling in his role as a power broker who cuts through bureaucratic inefficiency. He prides himself on delivering results for foreign investors, demanding a 10% stake in their ventures as payment. Ivanov justifies his actions as a necessary extension of his state security duties, though his motivations are clearly self-serving. The passage underscores the chaotic, opportunistic environment of post-Soviet capitalism.

Ivanov's worldview is further explored as he contrasts the old Soviet system's inefficiencies with the dynamic, albeit treacherous, new economy. He dismisses the old regime's failures, where incompetence was rewarded, and embraces the current climate of unchecked ambition. However, he acknowledges the lingering corruption in courts, police, and security services, framing himself as a solution to these problems. Ivanov's arrogance is palpable as he positions himself as superior to both the outdated Soviet bureaucracy and the inexperienced foreign investors he manipulates.

The chapter concludes with Ivanov's assistant, Shvets, entering the office and tending to his hungover boss. Their interaction reveals Ivanov's paranoia about appearing weak, especially in front of younger colleagues. Shvets mentions preparations for a trip to Beirut, hinting at future operations. Ivanov's character is cemented as a cunning yet deeply flawed figure, embodying the moral ambiguity and ruthless ambition that define the world of espionage and power brokering in the novel.

Chapter 37

In Chapter 37, CIA operative Mitch Rapp and his colleague Hurley confront a banker named Dorfman, who has been aiding terrorists. To extract information, Rapp threatens Dorfman's poodle with a knife, exploiting the banker's emotional attachment to the animal. Dorfman, unable to bear the thought of his dog being harmed, relents and opens his safe, revealing Nazi memorabilia and financial documents linked to terrorist activities. The scene underscores Rapp's ruthless efficiency and the moral ambiguity of his methods, as well as Dorfman's twisted priorities—prioritizing his dog over his complicity in terrorism. Hurley executes Dorfman, cementing the chapter's tense, violent tone.

The narrative shifts to Moscow, where SVR officer Ivanov reflects on a lucrative gas deal he has secured through a mix of negotiation and intimidation. Drawing parallels to The Godfather, Ivanov views post-Soviet Russia as a lawless landscape where power and corruption dominate. He takes pride in his ability to cut through bureaucratic inefficiencies, offering foreign investors a streamlined—albeit unethical—path to profits. His self-justification highlights the cynicism of the era, where former Soviet officials like him exploit the system for personal gain while dismissing younger, more legitimate entrepreneurs.

Ivanov's worldview is further explored as he contrasts the Soviet Union's failed communist experiment with the chaotic capitalism of modern Russia. He criticizes the old system's inefficiencies, where incompetence was rewarded, and talent suppressed. In contrast, he sees the current era as dynamic but treacherous, with remnants of Soviet corruption still hindering progress. Ivanov positions himself as a necessary fixer, leveraging his state security role to control access to resources and extract a 10% stake from every deal, embodying the greed and opportunism of the new elite.

The chapter closes with Ivanov's hungover frustration as his assistant, Shvets, attends to him. Their interaction reveals Ivanov's paranoia about appearing weak, especially to younger colleagues. Shvets mentions preparations for a trip to Beirut, hinting at future operations. Ivanov's blend of arrogance and insecurity encapsulates the chapter's themes of power, corruption, and the brutal pragmatism that defines both Rapp's world of espionage and Ivanov's cutthroat business dealings.

Chapter 38

The chapter opens with a tense scene where Rapp, an operative, threatens a banker named Dorfman by holding a knife to his dog's eye. Dorfman, emotionally distraught, relents and opens his safe to reveal Nazi memorabilia, confirming his ties to terrorist financiers. Rapp and his partner Hurley retrieve critical files and disks, exposing Dorfman's role in aiding terrorists. Despite Dorfman's pleas that he was merely a businessman, Hurley executes him, emphasizing the gravity of his crimes. The duo then prepares to leave for Zurich, hinting at their next mission involving financial networks.

Meanwhile, the narrative shifts to Moscow, where Ivanov, a corrupt SVR officer, reflects on a lucrative gas deal secured through intimidation. He compares post-Soviet Russia to The Godfather, highlighting the pervasive corruption and power struggles. Ivanov prides himself on leveraging his position to exploit foreign investors, demanding a 10% stake in their ventures. He justifies his actions as necessary to protect Russia's resources, though his motives are clearly self-serving. The chapter underscores the chaotic blend of capitalism and criminality in the new Russian economy.

Ivanov's arrogance is further illustrated as he interacts with his subordinate, Shvets, who brings him water and aspirin after a night of revelry. Ivanov's headache mirrors his frustration with the evolving power dynamics, fearing any display of weakness. The conversation reveals Ivanov's disdain for the younger generation while also hinting at his reliance on them. The scene closes with Shvets preparing to travel to Beirut, suggesting another layer of intrigue and corruption in Ivanov's operations.

The chapter juxtaposes two parallel storylines: Rapp's ruthless efficiency in dismantling terrorist financial networks and Ivanov's exploitative maneuvers in Russia's shadow economy. Both narratives explore themes of power, corruption, and moral ambiguity. Rapp's mission is driven by a sense of justice, however brutal, while Ivanov's actions are purely self-interested. The contrast highlights the global scale of the novel's conflict, where operatives and oligarchs alike navigate a world where loyalty and morality are often secondary to survival and profit.

Chapter 39

In Chapter 39 of American Assassin, Rapp and Hurley confront Dorfman, a banker suspected of aiding terrorists, in a tense and brutal interrogation. Rapp threatens Dorfman's poodle with a knife, exploiting the man's emotional attachment to force him to open a hidden safe. Dorfman relents, revealing the safe's contents, which include incriminating evidence linking him to Nazi affiliations and terrorist financing. Hurley executes Dorfman, justifying it as necessary to their mission, and the duo prepares to leave for Zurich to pursue further leads. The scene underscores the ruthless tactics employed by the operatives and the moral ambiguities of their work.

The chapter then shifts to Moscow, introducing Ivanov, a corrupt SVR officer who leverages his position for personal gain. Ivanov reflects on a lucrative gas deal he facilitated, comparing his methods to those in The Godfather.
